The fund gained 3.05% in February, ending at €20.63 on the 27th of February, just below our high of €20.68 the day before. This appears to be a slight underperformance of European benchmarks, but an outperformance of global benchmarks. Most investors have likely forgotten what unsettled markets in February, given the recent focus on war and oil. We have no special insight there, other than noting that a U.S. administration facing an election typically seeks to avoid an economic crisis. Our portfolio has been volatile, but absent a sustained downturn, it should remain resilient. February's real concern was AI disruption and the so called "SaaSocalypse." We believe our holdings are largely insulated from AI risk, with only one or two positions open to debate. At the same time, we have not yet found compelling bargains: high-quality names have merely shifted from expensive to moderately expensive. A few stocks are priced as if severe disruption is inevitable; while we do not fully share that view, the outlook is still too fluid for us to take a contrarian position. We are happy with our portfolio of defensive names and "old world" industrial and consumer companies.

The top contributor was Jardine Matheson, the Asian focused conglomerate currently simplifying its structure to realize value. There has been significant insider buying in January and February, an ongoing share buyback and many of its listed subsidiaries have reported interesting updates. LNA provided preliminary organic sales growth for 2025 of 7.6%, exceeding the upwardly revised guidance of 7% (originally 6%). Outlook suggested further growth for 2026, as well as additional asset disposals, which should free up cash to delever the balance sheet. Cuckoo provided a provisional fourth quarter full year trading update indicating a double-digit sales growth with durable margins and an activist appears to have approached the board.

The top detractor was Loma Negra whose performance is linked to the slowly recovering Argentinian economy, which is improving slower than expected. The cement industry has significant ground to recover. Magnum Ice Cream's shares fell around 15% on their debut earnings announcement, reflecting investor disappointment over the profit miss and headwinds from post-spin-off adjustments, currency effects and shifting consumer trends. Management sees 2025 as a transitional year and continues to see 3-5% organic growth and margin gains ahead. We have lost count of how many times we have commented on the performance of Brightstar (formerly IGT). Admittedly it has been a volatile journey, but the position remains one of the biggest earners of the fund. With a 7% dividend yield and a defensive business model, it should scream value, but we understand the long-duration characteristics of the equity story. Time will tell.
